

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

SOCIALISM IN ENGLAND.

1.—THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOCIALIST IDEAL.

“We are all Socialists now,” avowed the Right Honorable Sir William Vernon Harcourt in the British House of Commons lately, and the Prince of Wales recently made the same confession. Whatever may be the value of these vague declarations, it is certain that the progress of Socialism is just now the most marked characteristic of English thought.<sup>1</sup>

At the same time, the influence of Socialism in English public life may very easily be overlooked by a casual observer, especially as it is still often ignored or misapprehended by public men themselves. English politics are, by tradition, so exclusively an affair of the “classes” that even the greatest movements in democratic thought are apt to escape the notice of those unaccustomed to watch the tendencies of the still largely inarticulate masses. The development of Socialistic institutions has, moreover, been so gradual, and has met with such universal acceptance, that the great majority of citizens are still quite unaware of the extent to which Individualist principles have been abandoned. The ordinary party politician, intent only upon the issues of the moment, would probably deny that Socialism, as a vital political force, has any existence in England at all.

Americans in particular find it difficult adequately to realize the rapid progress of Democracy in England, whether political or social. Those unfamiliar with English political life are almost inevitably led to mistake the surviving forms of Feudalism, with their corresponding social inequalities, for greater drawbacks and deductions from the political Democracy than they really are. It may confidently be asserted, ✓ that the existence of an hereditary peerage offers less of an obstacle to genuine reform than that of the political "rings and bosses," so graphically portrayed by Mr. Bryce.<sup>1</sup> The English Conservative Party, moreover, by no means corresponds to the various conservative or reactionary elements in continental politics, but is itself constantly being "permeated" by new ideas emanating from the other side. A party whose leaders carried the abolition of the Corn Laws (1846), most of the Factory Acts, household suffrage in the towns (1867), and Democratic local self-government in London and the rural districts (1888), cannot be said to be a mere party of reaction. The fact that all these measures were unwilling concessions to popular pressure only emphasizes their democratic character.

Nor is it easy to realize the extent of the progress of the economic side of Democracy—that is to say, Socialism itself. Students have grown so accustomed to think of Socialism as a mere "Utopia," spun from the humanity-intoxicated brains of various Frenchmen of the beginning of the century, that they find great difficulty in recognizing it in any other aspect. But on the part of the critics this is simple ignorance. Down to the present generation the aspirant after social reform, whether Socialist or Individualist, naturally embodied his ideas in a detailed plan of a new social order, from which all contemporary evils were eliminated. Just as Plato had his "Republic," Campanella his "City of the Sun," and Sir Thomas Moore his "Utopia," so Baboeuf had his "Charter of Equality," Cabet his "Icaria," St. Simon his "Industrial System," and Fourier his ideal "Phalanstery." Robert Owen spent a fortune in pressing upon a stiff-necked generation a "New Moral World;" and even Comte, superior, as he was, to many of the weaknesses of his time, must needs add a detailed "Polity" to his "Philosophy" of Positivism.

The leading feature of all these proposals (not excluding the last) was what may be called their "statical" character. The ideal society was represented as a perfectly balanced equilibrium without need or possibility of future organic alteration. Now-a-days, owing mainly to the efforts of Comte, Darwin and Spencer, we can no longer think of the future society as an unchanging state. The social ideal from being statical has become dynamic. The necessity of the constant growth and development of the social organism has become axiomatic. No philosopher now looks for anything but the gradual passing of the old order into the new, without breach of continuity or abrupt general change of social tissue. The new becomes itself old, often before it is consciously recognized as new, and history shows us nothing but constant gradual evolution.

any special Shibboleth as by a complete difference as to the main principles of social organization. The essential contribution of the century to sociology has been the supersession of the Individual by the Community as the starting point of social investigations.<sup>1</sup> Socialism is the product of this development, arising, with it, from the contemporary industrial evolution. On the economic side, Socialism implies the collective administration of rent and interest, leaving to the individual only the wages of his labor, of hand or brain. On the political side, it involves the collective control over, and ultimate administration of, all the main instruments of wealth production. On the ethical side, it expresses the general recognition of fraternity, the universal obligation of personal service, and the subordination of personal ambition to the common good.

These fundamental ideas of Socialism do not always find explicit expression in the programme of any one exponent. The character of the propaganda, like its practical demands upon the legislature, is necessarily conditioned by the particular circumstances of the locality and the time. Socialism suffers, too, like every other movement from the imperfections of its advocates and adherents. Springing, as it does, from the existence of hideous social wrongs, and the unspeakable misery of tens of thousands of sufferers, we must not be surprised to find it frequently allied with bitterness, hatred and the wild justice of revenge. Long despised and rejected by nearly all the educated class, it is not to be wondered at that Socialism should find expression in forms and plans often not consistent with science or with themselves. An easy triumph usually awaits those defenders of contemporary institutions who are satisfied with exposing the fallacies of any particular socialist writer. The more candid student will endeavor to find out what it is, amid these fallacies and inconsistencies, that has secured the allegiance of millions, and has been a beacon of hope to the workers for more than a generation. Worthy opponents will seek to deal with Socialism, not in its weakest, but in its strongest aspects; and those who have fully realized the processes of social evolution will be prepared to find socialistic changes taking place under all those disguises by which men love to persuade themselves that the existing order is strong and "endureth forever." In England, especially, we shall find that the progress of Socialism is to be sought mainly among those who are unconscious of their Socialism, many of whom, indeed, still proclaim their adherence to Individualism, Self-help and Laissez Faire. But in any useful classification position will not so much depend upon the label which a man gives to his opinions or actions as upon their actual character. Not all those who are now coming forward to claim the name of Socialist can be admitted as such, whilst many thousands have become Socialists without knowing it.

A well-considered and sober description of the Socialist Ideal, in its modern development, may be found in the following prospectus of one of the existing English socialist organizations:

"The Fabian Society consists of Socialists. It therefore aims at the reorganization of society by the emancipation of land and industrial capital from individual and class ownership, and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit. In this way only can the natural and acquired advantages of the country be equitably shared by the whole people.

"The Society accordingly works for the extinction of private property in land, and of the consequent individual appropriation, in the form of rent, of the price paid for permission to use the earth, as well as for the advantages of superior soils and sites.

"The Society, further, works for the transfer to the community of the administration of such industrial capital as can conveniently be managed socially. For, owing to the monopoly of the means of production in the past, industrial inventions and the transformation of surplus income into capital have mainly enriched the proprietary class, the worker being now dependent on that class for leave to earn a living.

"If these measures be carried out, without compensation (though not without such relief to expropriated individuals as may seem fit to the community), rent and interest will be added to the reward of labor, the idle class now living on the labor of others will necessarily disappear, and practical equality of opportunity will be maintained by the spontaneous action of economic forces with much less interference with personal liberty than the present system entails.

"For the attainment of these ends, the Fabian Society looks to the spread of socialist opinions, and the social and political changes consequent thereon. It seeks to promote these by the general dissemination of knowledge as to the relation between the individual and society in its economic, ethical and political aspects."

This, however, affords merely a summary of the ideal principles of social organization, and gives no account of the various modifications of the existing society through which the ideal is likely to be attained. Another organization supplies this political forecast as follows; but it must be observed that this somewhat crude programme is admittedly awkwardly worded, and does not fairly represent its present exponents:

"As measures called for to palliate the evils of our existing society, the Social-Democratic Federation urges for immediate adoption:

"The Compulsory Construction of healthy artisan and agricultural laborers' dwellings in proportion to the population, such dwellings to be let at rents to cover the cost of construction and maintenance alone.

"Free compulsory education for all classes, together with the provision of at least one wholesome meal a day in each school.

"Eight hours or less to be the normal working day in all trades.

"Cumulative Taxation upon all incomes above a fixed minimum not exceeding £300 a year.

"State Appropriation of Railways, with or without compensation.

"The establishment of National Banks, which shall absorb all private institutions that derive a profit from operations in money or credit.

"Rapid Extinction of the National Debt.

"Nationalization of the Land, and organization of agricultural and industrial armies under State control on co-operative principles.

"As means for the peaceable attainment of these objects, the Social-Democratic Federation advocates:

"Adult Suffrage; Annual Parliaments; Proportional Representation; Payment of Members; and Official Expenses of Election out of the rates; Abolition of the House of Lords and all Hereditary Authorities. Disestablishment and Disendowment of all State Churches."

It may be summed up that the progress of Socialism in England has hitherto been, and is still being accomplished, in four leading directions, viz.:

✓ 1. Increasing restrictions upon the private ownership of land and capital. (Factory Acts, &c.)

✓ 2. Gradual supersession of private industrial ventures by public administration. (National Telegraphs, Municipal tramways, Parochial schools.)

✓ 3. Progressive absorption by taxation of unearned incomes (rent and interest), and "rent of ability." (Income tax, taxes on real property, &c.)

✓ 4. The supplementing of private charity by public philanthropy, aiming at raising the condition of the "residuum." (Education, improved dwellings, &c.)

Philanthropic reformers will be surprised to find some of these measures classed as socialistic. They, as well as many Socialists, have been so accustomed to think of Socialism merely as an Ideal, that they do not recognize the steps by which that Ideal is being gradually realized. Wherever rent and interest are being absorbed for public purposes, wherever the collective organization of the community is being employed in place of individual effort, wherever, in the public interest, the free use of private land or capital is being further restrained,—there one more step towards the complete realization of the Socialist Ideal is being taken. Society is reforming itself on Collectivist, not on Individualist principles, and although the advocates of each particular change intend no further alteration, the result is nevertheless an increasing social momentum in the same general direction.

The present tendency of English thought is strongly in favor of further development on these lines, and in the following pages some account will be given of this tendency, as exhibited, not only in the avowedly socialist movement itself, but also in the Churches, at the Universities, among the economists, in legislation, in current politics, and in municipal life.

2.—THE RISE OF THE ENGLISH SOCIALIST MOVEMENT.

✓ It is characteristic of England that although the present socialist movement there, as a conscious popular agitation of any vitality, is scarcely more than eight years old, the progressive Socialism in English politics dates from the very beginning of the century.<sup>1</sup> Nothing like an adequate account of this development can here be attempted. It is easy to trace the fore-runners of the present movement, and that in more than one direction,<sup>1</sup> but it must more properly be regarded as the conscious and explicit expression of what has long been the growing force in England. It is true that with the collapse of the Chartist movement in 1848, all serious agitation of a socialist character came to an end, and for thirty years the popular movements in England took the forms of a development of trades unions, the progress of co-operative distributive stores and building societies, in conjunction with the purely political agitation for the Parliamentary franchise. But the socialist leaven was still at work. The Chartist survivors continued to be centres of quiet education of their comrades. The ideas of Marx and Lassalle filtered in through French and German refugees, as well as through the personal influence, of Marx himself, on a select few. { The latter influence of the Political Economists, notably that of John Stuart Mill,<sup>2</sup> gradually prepared the public mind for socialist proposals, especially on the subject of the "unearned increment" of land values. } The course of industrial development was bringing about the intervention of the legislature in every factory and in almost every trade. The growth of democratic feeling was compelling the political enfranchisement of one class after another, of poorer and poorer citizens, until now almost as large a proportion of the population, as in the United States itself, is registered as entitled to vote.

The constant denunciations of the current bourgeois ideals by the "Christian Socialists," by Carlyle and his perpetually renewed stream of enthusiastic, if temporary, disciples, by Ruskin and many of his literary and artistic supporters, as well as by the small but persistent band of "Positivists," could not fail to exert a potent disintegrating force.

All this time popular education was progressing at an enormous rate, until the illiterate workman of the Chartist times has almost disappeared. It was, moreover, becoming apparent since 1867, that the mere possession of voting power did not suffice to cure the festering ulcers of urban poverty, and all sections of the popular party were ripe for the development of an avowedly socialist policy.

The occasion out of which the movement arose was an unexpected one. Little as Mr. Henry George intended it, there can be no doubt that it was the enormous circulation of his "Progress and Poverty," which gave the touch which caused all the seething influences to crystallize into a popular socialist movement. The optimistic and confident tone of the book, and the irresistible force of its popularization of Ricardo's Law of Rent, sounded the dominant "note" of the English Socialist party of to-day. Adherents of Mr. George's views gathered into little propagandist societies, and gradually developed, in many cases, into complete Socialists. During the year 1881, moreover, the coercive measures introduced by Mr. Gladstone's ministry against the Irish Land League had alienated many of the earnest Radicals from the Liberal party, and these were still further repelled by the "untoward events," which were happening in Egypt. It became evident that "Liberalism" was not inconsistent with shameless international aggression in the interests of the officers and the bondholders.<sup>1</sup> The years of Mr. Gladstone's administration were successively frittered away without any real effort to accomplish social reforms. The neglect of English social questions became more and more pressingly felt, and it was mainly the feeling due to these political incidents that caused the first definitely socialist organization to arise. This was a body called the "Democratic Federation," founded in March, 1881, by the efforts of Mr. H. M. Hyndman, Mr. Herbert Burrows, Miss Helen Taylor (stepdaughter of John Stuart Mill) and some others. Mr. Joseph Cowen, at that time member of Parliament for Newcastle-on-Tyne, a life-long Democrat, was one of the active helpers from the first, although this was not publicly known. The only distinctively socialist proposal explicitly set forth in the first programme of this organization was "Nationalization of the Land,"<sup>2</sup> placed ninth in the list, but it was from the first essentially a socialist body, and it changed its name in September, 1883, to the "Social Democratic Federation." Under this title it became a propagandist organization of great effect in London, and many of the provincial industrial centres, having scores of energetic and self-supporting local branches. It is undoubtedly due to the bold and unsparing personal efforts made by the early leaders of this society that Socialism has become widely known in England. Other Socialist societies arose, by fission, or by differentiation, until the influence of Socialism upon Democratic thought and politics has become admittedly enormous. The change in tone of English political leaders since 1880, is obvious and daily increasing, until it is not too much to assert that the Radical party, largely the creation of the Individualist Philosophers of seventy years ago, is now thoroughly permeated with socialist ideas. The numerical increase of nominal socialists is hindered by this very success. Those, who in Germany, would naturally be enrolled as members of the Social Democratic party, in England still call themselves Liberals or Radicals, but demand such socialist measures as the "municipalization" of urban land, the special taxation of rents and mining royalties, and the public provision of artisans' dwellings. This permeation is apparently destined to continue, and the avowed socialist party in England will probably remain a comparatively small disintegrating and educational force, supplying ideas and principles of social reconstruction to each of the great political parties in turn, as the changing results of English politics bring them alternately into power.

3.—THE ENGLISH SOCIALIST ORGANIZATIONS.

The difficulty in describing the English socialist organizations is their constant fluidity. Their programmes and principles remain, and even their leaders, but their active membership is continually changing. A steady stream of persons influenced by socialist doctrines passes into them, but after a time most or these cease to attend meetings the subjects of which have become familiar, and gradually discontinue their subscriptions. These persons are not lost to the movement: they retain their socialist tone of thought, and give effect to it in their trades unions, their clubs, and their political associations. But they often cease to belong to any distinctly socialist organization, where they are replaced by newer converts.

The character of the organizations themselves is no less unstable. It was intended, in almost every case, that they should be federal in form, the Executive consisting of delegates from the local "branches." As a matter of fact they have really consisted of propagandist committees, usually in London, with more or less organized knots of adherents in other parts of London and in certain provincial towns. These so-called "branches" fluctuate continually in strength, and vary in character from almost independent autonomous and self-supporting societies, down to mere centres to which lecturers are supplied and through which literature is distributed. Neither the size nor the number of these "branches" is of so much importance as the existence, in many constituencies, of a few energetic political workers who see the weakness of the programmes of the great political parties, and who, knowing precisely what they want, and giving voice to the vague popular feeling, are able to exercise an altogether disproportionate influence on the candidates and party managers. It is the weight of the Socialist criticism of the merely "political" programmes of both parties, not its numerical strength, which has made it, under one name or another, the most potent influence in English politics to-day.

The largest, as well as the oldest of the existing socialist societies in England is the Social Democratic Federation. Founded by a small number of educated middle-class reformers, it became, almost from the first, a democratic and popular body, and to it belong the great majority of the avowed Socialists of the wage-earning class. It consists nominally of a central council of delegates, sitting in London, and a number of "branches" in London and most of the large provincial towns. Each of these branches carries on an active local propaganda by means of incessant lectures, open-air meetings and the sale of literature. Some of them bring, in addition, considerable pressure to bear on current politics by influencing candidates, and by running candidates of their own at local elections. This influence has been particularly successful at Battersea (London), where Mr. John Burns, the local leader, was lately returned at the head of the poll for the London County Council (the new municipality of the metropolis), and at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where three socialists were recently elected to the School Board in face of the combined opposition of all other parties, religious, educational and political. The Council in London maintains friendly relations with the socialist party in other countries, issues manifestos on matters of current interest, organizes "demonstrations" in London, and maintains a weekly newspaper, Justice, (price one penny) their special organ, which has the largest circulation of any socialist periodical. In economics it follows Karl Marx; in politics it is "collectivist" as well as extremely democratic, and is marked by a tone of bitter repudiation of both liberal and conservative politicians. It denounces especially the "Conservatism" of the trades union leaders, and the working members of Parliament, as well as the "Jingo" foreign policy carried on by both great parties in the interests of capitalists and the aristocracy.

The most active members of the Social Democratic Federation are Mr. H. M. Hyndman,<sup>1</sup> Mr. John Burns,<sup>2</sup> and Mr. Herbert Burrows. Mrs. Annie Besant<sup>3</sup> has lately brought her powerful influence to the aid of this body.

<sup>1</sup>Graduate of Trinity College, Cambridge; author of The Historical Basis of Socialism (London, 1883; Kegan Paul & Co.); The Bankruptcy of India; England for all (London, 1881; E. W. Allen); The Coming Revolution in England (London, W. Reeves); Socialism and Slavery (London, Modern Press); and many other pamphlets and articles on Socialism.

<sup>2</sup>A working engineer with a magnificent gift of oratory; unsuccessful candidate for Parliament at Nottingham in 1885; indicted for sedition, April, 1886, but acquitted; imprisoned for "obstructing the police" at a demonstration in Trafalgar Square in 1888; elected member of the London County Council for Battersea, January, 1889.

<sup>3</sup>The well known author and lecturer, late co-editor with Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, M. P., of The National Reformer, vice-president of the National Secular Society and of the Malthusian League; secretary of the Matchmakers' Trade Union; secretary of the Law and Liberty League; member of the Fabian Society and of the Social Democratic Federation; member of the London School Board (returned at the top of the poll for the Tower Hamlet Division, November, 1888); late editor of The Link and Our Course; prosecuted with Mr. Bradlaugh in 1877, for publishing Dr. Knowlton's Fruits of Philosophy, because of her atheistic and Malthusian opinions; deprived in 1878 of the custody of her daughter, a "ward of court," by order of the court of chancery; author of My Path to Atheism, The Law of Population, Autobiographical Sketches, Modern Socialism, and numerous Freethought, Political and Socialist pamphlets and essays.

Mr. H. H. Champion was for some years an active worker for this organization, but his conduct being disapproved, he was expelled, and now carries on an agitation independently, the chief aim of which is the legislative shortening of the hours of labor. He has taken the leading part in trying to enforce the "Shop Hours Regulation Act," passed in 1887 at the instance of Sir John Lubbock, M. P.

The central office of the Social Democratic Federation is at 181 Queen Victoria street, London, E. C. Among their more important issues may be named "Socialism Made Plain" (71st thousand), "The Socialist Catechism," by J. L. Joynes, M. A. (20th thousand), Mr. Hyndman's "A Commune for London," and "The Emigration Fraud" (one penny each); "The Principles of Socialism," by Mr. Hindman and Mr. Morris, price fourpence; Prince Krapotkin's "Appeal to the Young," and Karl Marx' "Wage Labour and Capital" (one penny each).

The other large popular organization in England is the "Socialist League," founded in 1883 by Mr. William Morris,<sup>1</sup> who had been one of the active members of the Social Democratic Federation. The grounds of his secession were mainly personal, but the new body developed important differences as to the method of advancing the socialist cause. Whilst accepting the collectivist principle of public control over the instruments of wealth production, the Socialist League insists strongly upon the necessity of this control being exercised by free communal groups, only loosely and voluntarily associated in larger aggregates. On this ground it has often leanings towards the "Anarchist" section, in resisting the tendency to an over-centralized administration, to which collectivists are prone. This attitude is emphasized by the repugnance of its leader to the machinery and methods of current politics which causes it to confine itself to the dissemination of the socialist principles and ideal, without endeavoring directly to influence the actual mode of their application to the current social evolution. This purely educational attitude, whilst not unattractive to students, and to literary and artistic workers, fails to interest the mass of the wage-workers. On the other hand it attracts most of the foreign socialist refugees in this country, who have brought from the continent a distrust of the merely "bourgeois" politics of French and German Liberalism. These give the Socialist League a disposition occasionally to coquet vaguely with those "counsels of despair" to which the oppressed classes are prone when hope of political regeneration dies out among them; and while such influences inflame the prevalent feeling against the feeble and hesitating efforts of even the Radical political leaders, they prevent the League finding adherents among the ordinary working men.<sup>1</sup> It is accordingly diminishing in numerical strength, and many of its members have fallen away to set up separate local organizations or to join other bodies.

<sup>1</sup>This is typical of the change of thought among the masses. The Trades Union leaders still belong, in great measure, to the school of Individualist Radicalism, out of which their followers have already passed, and the leaders' dislike and distrust of political action causes them, as it does the Socialist League, occasionally to throw themselves into the hands of the wilder revolutionary party. This happened, for instance, at the international Trades Union Congress in London in November, 1888, when the English delegates coalesced with the Foreign Anarchists, rather than support the mildly "collectivist" proposals as to the legislative shortening of the hours of labor. (See Mr. Adolphe Smith's Critical Essay on the Congress; London, 59 Barclay Road, Walham Green.)

The Socialist League is nominally organized on a plan similar to that of the Social Democratic Federation, with a central council and a number of local branches. These have, however, latterly become much less numerous.

The organ of the League is the "Commonweal," published weekly, price one penny. This has now a smaller circulation than "Justice," but it often contains poems and articles of high literary merit. It is marked by an equally acrid denunciation of all politicians, and it may be added that both papers unite in attacking Mr. Henry George, and the Land Nationalization movement generally.

The most active member of the Socialist League, besides Mr. William Morris, is Mr. E. Belfort Bax.<sup>1</sup>

The head office of the Socialist League is at 13 Farringdon Road, London, E. C., but its most important centre is Mr. Morris' residence, Kelmscott House, Upper Mall, Hammersmith, London. Its chief publication, other than the lectures of Mr. Morris and Mr. Bax, already mentioned, is "The Manifesto of the Socialist League" (price one penny.)

The Fabian Society occupies a different sphere as a Socialist Society from that of the two larger bodies. It was founded in 1883<sup>2</sup> as an educational and propagandist centre, and includes members of all the other organizations, with a number of active workers chiefly of the middle class, and "literary proletariat." It furnishes lecturers in considerable number to all meetings where Socialism, in any guise whatsoever, can possibly be introduced, and its own fortnightly discussions have been useful in formulating and adapting socialist principles in relation to actual contemporary conditions. Two of its members were recently elected on the London School Board. The Society exercises a considerable influence, more real than apparent, by the personal participation of its members in nearly all reform movements, as well as by their work at the Universities and in the fields of journalism and the teaching of Political Economy. It is not, however, a numerous body, and makes no attempt to increase its numbers beyond a convenient limit. Its influence on the socialist movement has been marked by the present predominance of the ideas of gradual social evolution, and the importance of correct economic analysis. The address of the Secretary is 180 Portsdown Road, London. The chief publications of the Society which are still in print are "Facts for Socialists from the Political Economists and Statisticians" (Tract No. 5); "Capital and Land" (Tract No. 7 price one penny each), and "Why are the Many Poor?" (Tract No. 1—threepence per dozen.) An important course of seven lectures by members of the Society (George Bernard Shaw, Sidney Webb, LL.B., William Clarke, M. A., S. Olivier, B. A., Graham Wallas, M. A., Annie Besant and Hubert Bland), entitled "Fabian Essays in Socialism," is about to be published.

The Christian Socialist Society is a loosely organized society of Socialists who desire to lay special stress upon the fact that the doctrines and principles of Christianity, as taught by Jesus Christ, necessarily involve a socialistic state of society. The members consist largely of ministers of religion of various denominations all over the country, who give effect to their views in frequent sermons and religious writings. One of them has just been elected unopposed to the County Council of Staffordshire. The "Christian Socialist," a monthly newspaper, is practically maintained by the adherents of the society, under the editorship of Mr. W. H. P. Campbell (8 Lorne Villas, Brockley Road, Forest Hill, London, S. E.). The tone of the newspaper, as well as of the Society's publications, is that of broad unsectarian Christianity, with great insistence upon the moral obligation of the individual, and the necessity of unselfish subordination to the common weal.

The four organizations already mentioned are the only existing definitely socialist bodies of more than local influence. The "Guild of St. Matthew" will be noticed in connection with "Socialism in the Churches." Several local societies are, however, of considerable importance. In London, the Battersea branch of the Social Democratic Federation has become almost an independent society, completely dominating the political life of the important industrial constituency in which it is situated. (Office Sydney Hall, 36 York Road, Battersea.) It is probable that a socialist member of Parliament will be returned there at the next election, in place of the present capitalist Liberal representative.

An active former "branch" of the Socialist League has now become the Bloomsbury Socialist Society, having differed from the parent organization in desiring to take part in current politics. It is now carrying on an independent existence, its meetings taking place at 49 Tottenham street, Tottenham Court Road.

In the provinces the independent societies at Bristol and Sheffield deserve special notice. The "Clifton and Bristol Christian Socialist Society" is mainly a middle class body, with frankly democratic sympathies. It has exercised considerable influence in its own locality, its secretary (Mr. H. H. Gore, 22 - Clare street, Bristol,) having recently been elected a member of the Bristol School Board, after a sharp contest.

The "Sheffield Socialists" derive much of their inspiration from Mr. Edward Carpenter,<sup>1</sup> their most prominent member, and exhibit a tendency to Ruskinian Socialism, not free from influences akin to those emanating from Thoreau on the one hand, and from Tolstoi on the other. The duties of citizenship are, however, not neglected, and here also a socialist (Rev. Charles Peach) has recently been elected on the School Board.

The development of Socialism among the Northumberland miners and the workers of Tyneside has been specially interesting. This district is, in many respects, the most prosperous industrial centre in England, and the miners, in particular, by a well organized trades union and successful coöperative societies, stand almost at the head of the so-called "aristocracy of labor." Both the Social Democratic Federation and the Socialist League have pushed their propaganda with great vigor in all the populous centres. Numerous branches have been formed, which at one time possessed a local federal organization, and a large number of members have been at various times enrolled. Their influence was seen in the warning vote of "want of confidence" passed on the "Miners' Member" of Parliament (Mr. T. Burt), which was, however, afterwards rescinded, and, more recently, in the triumphant election already referred to, of three socialists to the Newcastle School Board.

In Scotland the socialist propaganda has had a corresponding success, and there are active "branches" in all the industrial centres. The "Scottish Land and Labor League" has become a definitely socialist organization, and the Land Nationalization movement, which is very wide-spread, is every day taking on more of a socialist character. The most influential Scotch Socialist is, perhaps, the Reverend John Glasse (Presbyterian), Old Friars Church, Edinburgh.

Ireland has not proved a successful field for avowed and conscious socialist propaganda, in consequence, no doubt, of its relatively backward industrial development. The whole tendency of the Parnellite movement is in favor of ultimate peasant proprietorship, and hardly anyone among the popular leaders, except Mr. Michael Davitt, recognizes the necessity even of Land Nationalization. It need, however, hardly be said that the Irish land movement has struck a heavy blow against landlordism, and it may very likely prove to be the case that this attack on "private property" will carry the Irish leaders, as it has their English supporters, to lengths as yet unsuspected by themselves.

There is a "Dublin Socialist Club," of small influence, at 16 Dawson Street, Dublin.

Description of the English socialist organizations would be incomplete without mention of the "Anarchist" section,<sup>1</sup> although this is infinitesimal in numbers. The high personal character and intellectual attainments of its leaders enable it to command a respect which neither its strength nor its doctrines would otherwise procure.

The English "Anarchists," unlike many of the American, and some of the Continental, claimants of that misleading appellation, are advocates of a free and voluntary communism, regulated only by moral suasion. They do not overlook the imperfect moral nature of existing humanity, but they lay great stress on the undoubted fact that many of our selfish and anti-social feelings are fostered by the existing competitive and authoritative system, and might be expected to disappear with it. Some of them admit that a free communism is only a remote ideal, to be reached only after a considerable development of Collectivism, but their practical tendency is usually against further advances of collective activity. The constant autonomy of the individual needs, they think, to be increased rather than diminished, even if the restriction originates at the desire of the individual himself.

<sup>1</sup>It is unnecessary to explain to the candid student that the "Anarchist" is, in no respect, an advocate of what is commonly known as "anarchy." He is so far from being a mere "criminal lunatic" that his main defect may be characterized as being "too good for this world."

The chief exponents in England of this scientific "Anarchism" are Prince Krapotkine<sup>1</sup> and Mrs. C. M. Wilson, and there is issued a monthly journal of uncertain vitality entitled "Freedom" (London, 19 Cursitor street—price one penny.)

Besides the socialist journals already mentioned, there exists a vigorous monthly entitled "Today" (London—price 3d—William Reeves, 185 Fleet St.), edited by Mr. Hubert Bland, and containing articles from all sides of the socialist movement. The "Church Reformer," (see page 34), is the organ of a distinctly Christian Socialism. (London, price 2d monthly, 8 Duke street, Adelphi, W. C.)

There are various other groups and minor organizations of Socialists, of a local and usually extremely fluctuating character. But, as has been already explained, by far the largest part of English Socialism is unconscious of itself as Socialism, and the avowed exponents of the principle appear, on a mere superficial glance, to be of quite minor importance in English public life.

The movement for Land Nationalization proper is largely participated in by Socialists, but maintains two independent organizations of importance. The "Land Nationalization Society" (London, 11 Southampton Street Strand), has for its principal exponent the eminent naturalist, Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace. The "English Land Restoration League" (London, 8 Duke street, Adelphi), a very vigorous organization of wide-spread influence, adheres more closely to the principles of Mr. Henry George. The Rev. J. E. Symes, Professor of Political Economy at University College, Nottingham, author of "A Short Text-book of Political Economy" (London, Rivingtons, 1888), is a member of the Council of this body, which also includes several members of Parliament. "A Joint Committee for the Taxation of Ground Rents and Values," (London, 18 Bouverie street, E. C.), formed by the English Land Restoration League, in conjunction with the London Municipal Reform League, enjoys the presidency of the Right Honorable Lord Hobhouse, K. C. S. I., and has succeeded in enlisting nearly all the liberal (and some Conservative) members of Parliament in support of the special taxation of urban land values. Its chief publication "A Plea for the Taxation of Ground Rents," (price twopence) was at the request of the Committee, written by a Socialist, and the arguments used therein support the complete Nationalization or Municipalization of all Rent. This committee, presenting its aims in the moderate and practical way dear to the English mind, has already exercised a most potent influence, and at least two-thirds of the members of the recently elected London County Council adopted its programme. The movement for the absorption by taxation of the site value of great cities is making enormous strides, and at the present moment<sup>1</sup> the lectures of Mr. Henry George are being presided over by Liberal members of Parliament and candidates for that honor, as well as by ministers and other leaders of the great Nonconformist religious bodies.

4.—SOCIALISM IN THE CHURCHES.

In spite of numerous statements to the contrary it is apparent that Socialism in England is by no means an atheistic or irreligious movement. It is true that many prominent Socialists are agnostics or atheists, but the same remark could be made of every reform movement. One or two enthusiastic Socialists have gone so far as to denounce Clericalism, and even Christianity as the necessary enemies of the Democracy. But the movement on the whole has kept itself remarkably clear of theological controversies, and every socialist society includes numbers of earnest Christians.

The Christians have, indeed, not been backward in taking their own part in the movement. The "Christian Socialist Society" is a standing assertion that Socialism is a necessary outcome of a sincere acceptance of Christian principles. In some localities, notably in parts of Scotland and the west of England, the greater part of the movement is religious in tone.

The Socialist influence in the churches is not confined to any one denomination. The established Episcopalian Church, strongly conservative in general bias, contains a large number of outspoken Socialist clergymen, especially among the younger "High Church" party.

The "Guild of St. Matthew," a widespread sacramental organization, with several hundred clerical and lay members, has become an essentially socialistic body and its founder and head, the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam, is a prominent worker in the Socialist cause, and was elected as such to the London School Board at the recent election. The monthly newspaper, "The Church Reformer," which is the organ of Mr. Headlam and the Guild is a frankly Socialist medium of great ability.

Socialism has lately formed the subject of discussion at various diocesan conferences, and at the annual "Church Congress," and was a prominent item last year at the Pan-Anglican Conference of Bishops. In no case has it met with general condemnation, the tone being usually one of inconsistent and timid approval. The bishops, indeed, paid it the tribute of a special committee, whose well-intentioned but ill-informed report contained the following exhortation:

"No more important problems can well occupy the attention—whether of clergy or laity—than such as are connected with what is popularly called Socialism. To study schemes proposed for redressing the social balance, to welcome the good which may be found in the aims or operations of any, and to devise methods, whether by legislation or by social combinations, or in any other way, for a peaceful solution of the problems without violence or injustice, is one of the noblest pursuits which can engage the thoughts of those who strive to follow in the footsteps of Christ."<sup>1</sup>

The memorial of the Guild of St. Matthew to this Pan-Anglican Conference, which drew forth the above Episcopal blessing, is perhaps the best exposition extant of the feeling of the Socialist members of the Established Church. After referring to the hideous revelations of the recent Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor, and the increasing instability of the commercial system, the Memorial proceeds to declare the growing conviction that—

"Our present social system—if the words 'social system' can be used of that which is largely the outcome of anarchic competition—is cruel and dishonest, and needs drastic reform and radical reorganization. The startling contrast between the hovels of the poor and the houses of the rich within the same city, between the pitiful wage of the laborer and the vast income of the idler, between the poverty of the tenant and the luxury of the landlord, especially in our large towns, has been put before English society with startling vividness. A wave of Socialist thought has swept over England. The older party divisions are becoming less and less distinct. Socialism seems destined to produce in the near future a perfectly new moral 'line of cleavage' in English society.

"Herein, we respectfully submit to your Grace, are great moral questions with which it is the plain duty of the Church to deal. It has long been conceded by many Churchmen that the housing and feeding of 'Christ's poor' are pre-eminently matters with which the followers of Him who fed the hungry and healed the sick should concern themselves. Under the 'Housing' question lies the land question as surely as the house stands on the land. Mr. George denounces our present land system as one that robs the many for the benefit of the few. His opponents retort with a charge of 'plunder,' and describe the movement for restoring to the people the value which they give to the land as one of 'robbery plus cant.' Shall the Church of Christ be dumb when men turn to her for guidance in this matter? Her priests, in the name of God, from the altars of His Church, proclaim 'Thou shalt not steal.' What is it to steal?

"Again, the Socialist objects to the competitive commercial system under which we live that it 'robs the poor because he is poor;' that it enables and encourages the capitalist to 'build his house by unrighteousness and his chambers by wrong,' inasmuch as it gives him the power, by taking advantage of the competition for a mere livelihood, to 'use (a large part of) his neighbor's service without wages, and give him not for his work.' The differences between political party programmes sink into insignificance beside the moral question here involved. Churchmen are beginning to ask, 'Is it true that the landlord and capitalist are able, independently of any work done by themselves, to appropriate a large share of the results of the labor of their unprivileged brethren? If it be true that this is so, is it just?'"

The Memorial then proceeds to insist on two Christian principles, viz.:

"First, Every man should work. There should be no idle class; no class of those who consume but do not produce; no privileged body allowed to live upon the produce of others' labor without rendering a due equivalent.

"Secondly, The produce of labor must be distributed on a much more equitable system than at present. The landlord and the capitalist, say the Socialists, secure by far too great a share of the wealth created by labor. They take the first and often the largest share with an acknowledged tendency to increase their takings till no more than a bare subsistence is left to the laborer. The Socialist claim may not be orthodox economy from the stand-point of laissez faire, but it sounds strangely like an echo of St. Paul's dictum, 'The husbandman that laboreth must be the first to partake of the fruits.' 'He that plougheth ought to plough in hope, and he that thresheth to thresh in hope of partaking.' And yet it has needed almost a revolution within the last generation to bring 'hope' within the life of the English 'husbandman.'"

This remarkable declaration of Christian politics concludes as follows:

"Your memorialists respectfully submit, therefore, that with the main contentions of the Socialist, the Christian is not only able but bound to agree. With the moral questions herein involved the theologian is bound to concern himself. The suggestion of practical remedies belongs rather to the province of the politician. All suggested remedies must, of course, be tested by the Christian standard of right and wrong, and no so-called reform which robs a man of that which is rightfully his own can be sanctioned. But the question of the moral basis of property, 'What is rightfully a man's own?' has to be boldly faced and answered."

Few of the Bishops, it need hardly be said, ever venture to tackle the question so strongly urged upon them, but they do not now dare to condemn it. The great majority of the beneficed clergy, especially in the rural districts, scarcely yet realize that Socialism is anything more than the "red spectre" dreaded of continental bourgeoisie, but those who look out into the world are slowly becoming conscious that it is not without its import for Anglicanism. The Established Church is, indeed, obviously a socialist institution in form, and adherents to the "Establishment" are beginning to see that socialist influence is rather tending to weaken the prevailing Radical inclination to separate Church and State, than to incense the masses against theology.

In other denominations the socialist leaven is strong among the younger ministers, and even the leaders are now frequently socialistic in tone and spirit. Among the Wesleyans, the Reverend Hugh Price Hughes and the Reverend Mark Guy Pearse have made various outspoken declarations on the subject, and the "religious weeklies" devote a large and increasing space to the "labor problem" and the evil effects of "landlordism."

Among other Christian ministers of various denominations who have written approvingly on Socialism, may be cited the following: Rev. Canon Westcott, D. D., Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge University; Rev. Wilfrid Richmond, Warden of Glenalmond School; Rev. John Oakley, D. D., Dean of Manchester; Rev. H. C. Shuttleworth, Rev. T. Hancock ("The Banner of Christ in the hands of the Socialists;") Rev. Professor Elmslie, Rev. E. D. Girdlestone ("Society Classified," "Christian Socialism vs. Present Day Unsocialism;") Rev. P. H. Wicksteed ("Christianity and Personal Life," etc., also author of a remarkable "Alphabet of Political Economy," etc.); Rev. George Sarson ("Progress and Poverty"); Rev. John Glasse, Rev. T. Travers Sherlock, Rev. C. L. Marson, and many others.

It is indeed beginning to be suspected by not a few earnest Christians that the future of Christianity in England is very largely bound up with Socialism and Democracy. Unless Christianity can once more become the accepted faith of the masses, its influence must inevitably undergo a serious popular decline, and it is already certain that the masses will accept no anti-socialist faith. The churches are accordingly turning timidly towards the rising sun, and the eager reception, by evangelical Christian reformers, of Mr. Henry George as a notable champion of the faith, is significant of the change of tone. English Protestantism, in short, is gradually discarding its individualistic quietism and "other worldliness," and is coming more and more forward as an active political influence towards the creation of "the Kingdom of God on earth."

"Sion College," the central meeting place of the London Anglican clergy, welcomes Mr. Henry George to a lecture on his plan of Land Nationalization, and even continues the propaganda by lending its rooms for courses of lectures on Christian Socialism, at which Canon Wescott presides. Verily, even the Bishops "believe and tremble." But however well disposed they may be to social reforms, the great bulk of the clergy are, it need hardly be said, still attached strongly to the existing industrial order, and for want of economic knowledge, are usually unable to imagine any other, even as an ideal. Those who believe that Christian principles involve the acceptance of Socialism are still in an insignificant minority, but their influence is already apparent and is an obviously growing one.

5.—SOCIALISM AT THE UNIVERSITIES.

Oxford and Cambridge have long ceased to occupy the position of leaders of advanced thought in any department of study,—and in biology and sociology in particular—they have followed, rather than led, their generation. But as the places of education of a large though diminishing majority of the "classe dirigeante," their influences have an immense ultimate effect upon social administration. It is, therefore, not without significance that considerable attention should just now be paid to Socialism at both of these ancient seats of learning. At each of them several Fellows and Tutors of Colleges avow themselves Socialists, and are members of one or the other of the socialist organizations. The teaching of history and economics is much influenced by socialist tendencies. The subject of Socialism is discussed every week, in one aspect or another, at College debating societies, and socialist resolutions at the "Union" occasionally even command a majority of votes. Socialist lectures have lately been given in several Colleges by permission of the authorities, this part of the propaganda being chiefly performed by the Fabian Society, which has a standing "Universities Committee." The Guild of St. Matthew, a strongly socialistic organization [see page 34], has a permanent branch composed of Oxford undergraduates.

At Oxford the influence of T. H. Green and Arnold Toynbee<sup>1</sup> has formed the centre round which has grown up a distinctly socialist mode of thought, the influence of which is at present hardly checked by any formulated resistance. The "Toynbee Hall Settlement" in Whitechapel [East London], itself a marked example of the recent growth of "social compunction," is a nucleus of real, though somewhat sentimental and unpractical, Socialism, fed by a constant stream of University graduates, who are themselves mostly Socialists of one type or another.

<sup>1</sup>See his Industrial Revolution, notably the lecture entitled "Are Radicals Socialists?" A sympathetic account of Toynbee's life and work is given as Part I in the Seventh Series of Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, by Mr. F. C. Montague, M.A., author of The Limits of Individual Liberty.

Cambridge is, perhaps, less socialistic than Oxford, though more economic. More than one of its Professors confess, however, to belief in the ultimate triumph of socialist principles, and the younger generation of economic students is largely socialistic in spirit. A considerable proportion of the "Extension lecturers" supplied to the larger provincial towns are Socialists, and there is every sign of the movement extending. King's College, indeed, lent its lecture-room in the Lent Term, 1889, for the delivery of the series of seven lectures on the Basis and Idea of Socialism, which are about to be published by the Fabian Society. (See page 26).

Among recent notable publications from the Universities may be instanced Professor Karl Pearson's (of King's College, Cambridge, and University College, London,) "The Ethic of Freethought," a collection of Socialist Essays (London, 1888: Fisher Unwin); "Darwinism and Politics," by D. G. Ritchie, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Oxford (London, Sonnenschein, 1889); "The Moral Function of the State" (same author, to be obtained from the Guild of St. Matthew, 8 Duke street, Adelphi, London), and a translation of Schäffle's "Quintessence of Socialism," by Bernard Bosanquet, M.A., late Fellow of University College, Oxford (London, Sonnenschein).

It is, however, easy to exaggerate the extent to which a vague Socialism has unconsciously obtained a hold upon the two older Universities. It must not be forgotten that seven out of ten of the younger members of both Universities are in the stage of belonging merely to the unthinking "Junkerthum," which, in such an inquiry, counts for no more than the "pigs and Philisters" whom Heine excluded from the population of Göttingen. The great bulk of the intellectual life, moreover, is still cynically critical and suspicious of Democracy, and the University influence makes, on the whole, for Conservatism. A socialist movement, none the less potent because largely unconscious of itself, is, however, obviously at work.

It cannot be said that the English Universities have as yet had any influence on the socialist movement itself. Unlike the "Kathedrar Socialisten" of Germany, they have been affected by it, but have not themselves affected it. The radical vice of University life—the divorce of thought from action—has tended to deprive many resident University men, of all capacity, for real political work in national matters, whilst their social and municipal surroundings, far removed from the pressing industrial problems of the great cities, tend to hypnotize their mind and to lull even the most advanced of them to a placid acquiescence in, or merely spasmodic protest against, the status quo. This timidity has especially affected the University economists, and though these are largely socialist in opinion and in conversation, their published works still retain, in form as well as in matter, a strong impress of the crude Individualism which they unanimously profess to repudiate. A great change in this respect is, however, visible among the younger Fellows, who are shaking off the corrupting influence of the old style.

The University influence, hesitating and unpractical as it is, is, nevertheless, exercising a potent effect upon the current opinion of the English cultivated classes. A wide divergence of thought is here apparent between England and the United States. In England the old a priori Individualism is universally abandoned. No Professor ever founds any argument, whether in defence of the rights of property or otherwise, upon the inherent right of the individual to his own physical freedom and to the possession of such raw material as he has made his own by expending personal effort upon. "The first step must be to rid our minds of the idea that there are any such things in social matters as abstract rights" ("The State in Relation to Labor," ch. 1, p. 6, by the late W. Stanley Jevons, Professor of Political Economy at University College, London). The whole case on both sides is now made to turn exclusively on the balance of social advantage, and practically no Individualist axiomata media are allowed to be taken for granted. The older Individualist arguments are to be found now only in the "Liberty and Property Defence League,"<sup>1</sup> which has no philosophic importance, or in the writings of Mr. Herbert Spencer<sup>2</sup> and Mr. Auberon Herbert. It would be safe to say that the political influence of these latter gentlemen is absolutely imperceptible.

6.—SOCIALISM IN POLITICAL ECONOMY.

In no department of thought has the change been more apparent during the present generation than in the accepted tenets and general tone of Political Economy. For the first two generations of its history the Smith-Ricardo economics made, on the whole, for Individualism. The prevailing reaction against the monarchic and oligarchic bureaucracies led the earlier economists of this century to lean strongly towards Laissez Faire, and this tendency was accentuated by their essentially atomistic conception of society, and the shallow optimism which they had caught from Rousseau. The industrial revolution, which was all the time proceeding, had however the incidental effect of rendering obsolete most of their practical deductions, almost before they were formulated, and the obviously destructive effects of complete individual freedom of user of the means of production, compelled the statesman and the "practical man" to disregard the economist's mistaken warnings. Beginning in 1802, Factory Act after Factory Act was passed in the teeth of stubborn economic resistance, and the legislation of England for the last generation has been one long record of limitations on private property for the public good.<sup>1</sup>

Meanwhile a new conception of the State had arisen. From Comte, Darwin and Spencer the idea of the social Organism was gradually filtering into men's minds, and unconsciously altering all their political theories and ideals. It has gradually become recognized that a Perfect City was something different from any number of good citizens, something to be tried by other tests and weighed in other balances. The lesson of Evolution, at first thought to be the apotheosis of anarchic individual competition, is now recognized to be quite the contrary. We have to learn, Professor Huxley tells us,<sup>1</sup> to substitute consciously adapted coördination for internecine competition, if the Organism which will prove to be the "Fittest to Survive," is to be also the best. Even the Political Economists are learning this lesson, and the fundamental idea of a Social Organism paramount over and prior to the individual of each generation, is penetrating to their minds and appearing in their lectures, though it has not even yet affected to any great extent their more elaborate treatises.

The progress towards Socialism has, however, been strikingly apparent even in economic literature. The publication of J. S. Mills' "Political Economy," in 1848, conveniently marks the boundary between the old and the new economics. Every edition of Mills' book became more and more socialistic in tone, until his death revealed to the world in the "Autobiography" (p. 231-2) his emphatic and explicit repudiation of mere political democracy in favor of complete Socialism. Since then the progress has been rapid. By the definite rejection of the Wages Fund Theory, the development and extension of the Ricardian Law of Rent,<sup>2</sup> and the gradual modification and subordination of "Malthusianism," the scientific differences between the "orthodox" economists and the economic Socialists has now become mainly one of terminology and relative stress, with the result that one competent economist,<sup>1</sup> not himself a Socialist, publishes regretfully to the world that all the younger men are now Socialists, with many of the Professors.

<sup>2</sup> See numerous suggestions on this point throughout Mr. Sidgwick's Principles of Political Economy, and the article by the present writer, "The Rate of Interest and the Laws of Distribution," (Quarterly Journal of Economics January, 1888.)

Professor Henry Sidgwick (Professor of Moral Philosophy, Cambridge), the most cautious of men, even publishes an article with a view to correct the world's mistaken impression that Political Economy is opposed to Socialism, and shows that, on the contrary, the socialist proposals are a plain and obvious deduction from accepted economic principles.<sup>2</sup>

✓ This convergence has been facilitated by the fact } that <English Socialists are by no means blind } worshippers of Karl Marx.> While recognizing his valuable services to economic history, and as a stirrer of men's minds, a large number of English socialist economists reject his special contributions to pure economics. His theory of value meets with ✓ little support in English economic circles, where that of Jevons is becoming increasingly dominant.
Although the leaders of the two largest socialist organizations have been strongly influenced by Marx, the rank and file of the socialist party do not found their socialism on any special economic theories, but upon the patent results of individual ownership, as shown in the large payments for rent and interest.

The great bulk of the unconscious Socialism of the English voter and statesman has been based merely upon empirical observation, and has certainly not been affected by any notion of "surplus value." ✓
<The economic influence most potent among the Socialist Radicals is still that of John Stuart Mill.>

Recent economic publications betray the dominant collectivist influence even where this is not intended. What is perhaps the most popular handbook of "orthodox" Political Economy, published by one of the universities, is written by an ardent Communist, and another recent manual, "for the use of schools," is the production of a college professor of economics, who is an energetic public advocate of complete Land Nationalization.

It was computed in December, 1887, that out of a total of fourteen courses of lectures on economics being delivered under the auspices of various public bodies in London, eight, and possibly more, were being given by professed Socialists. I have been told that one of the "University Extension" societies lately found some difficulty in obtaining young economist lecturers sufficiently free from what some of its older members thought the socialistic taint. If it were not for the friendly services of such persons as Mr. Auberon Herbert (who serve the purpose of the stakes at the side of the glacier by which we note its motion), it would indeed be difficult to measure a progress which is so general.

When the editors of the Encyclopædia Britannica needed for their ninth edition an article setting forth the development and position of political economy, it was to a Socialistic Positivist that they addressed themselves, and the article took the form of a lengthy survey of the steady convergence of all the tendencies towards a socialist state.

"We have been suffering for a century," says one "orthodox" Professor, "from an acute outbreak of individualism, unchecked by the old restraints, and invested with almost a religious sanction by a certain soulless school of writers."<sup>1</sup> Economists fully recognize that this industrial anarchy cannot last. The ordinary middle-class citizen, like the average American, still believes that "free competition" and individual liberty represent the perfection of social order, but the economic philosopher sees this régime melting away before his eyes. It is significant that both Mr. Spencer and Mr. Auberon Herbert, practically the only two surviving philosophic adherents of complete Laissez Faire, betray in their writings that they are not political economists,<sup>2</sup> and it is a matter of common experience that a course of lessons in the "law of rent" will usually convert a mere Radical into something very like a Socialist. And this interest in political economy is increasing. The first edition of the English translation of Marx's "Capital" (by Dr. E. B. and Eleanor Marx Aveling) was soon exhausted, and more popular writings on economics now find a ready sale. Works like Gronlund's "Co-operative Commonwealth," and Bellamy's "Looking Backward," are exercising a potent influence on public ideals, and are but premature popularizations of the current economic views as to the future of society.

"It is indeed certain," sums up Dr. Ingram, "that industrial society will not permanently remain without a systematic organization. The mere conflict of private interests will never produce a well-ordered commonwealth of labor."<sup>1</sup>

English Economists formerly looked for escape from the present evil state of individualist chaos to the progress of voluntary coöperation. John Stuart Mill<sup>2</sup> hoped that, in some unexplained way, the growth of this movement would induce the present owners of land and the other indispensable means of wealth production voluntarily to cede to the public the unearned incomes which this ownership secures to them. Even so lately as 1874, it was possible for Professor Cairnes to think that help might be found (at any rate, by the better paid laborers) by means of coöperation in production, and in no other way. He then wrote, in words pregnant with import to the social reformer: "If workmen do not rise from dependence upon capital by the path of coöperation, then they must remain in dependence upon capital; the margin for the possible improvement of their lot is confined within narrow barriers which cannot be passed, and the problem of their elevation is hopeless. As a body, they will not rise at all. A few more energetic or more fortunate than the rest will, from time to time, escape, as they do now, from the ranks of their fellows to the higher walks of industrial life, but the great majority will remain substantially where they are. The remuneration of labor, as such, skilled or unskilled, can never rise much above its present level." (J. E. Cairnes, Emeritus Professor of Political Economy at University College, London, "Some Leading Principles of Political Economy," p. 348, 1874).

Fifteen years have passed away since these words were written, and it must now be apparent, even to the most sanguine of individualists, that the chance of the great bulk of the laborers ever arising by associations for coöperative production has become even less hopeful than it ever was, and Dr. J. K. Ingram has to tell us that modern economists, such as T. E. Cliffe Leslie (late Professor of Political Economy at Queen's University, Ireland) and President F. A. Walker, regard the idea as "chimerical" (Article on "Political Economy," in Encyclopædia Britannica, Vol. XIX, p. 382). Even so friendly an economist as Mr. Leonard Courtney<sup>1</sup> agrees in this view. Yet this, according to authorities so eminent, is the only hope for the laborer under the present arrangements of society, or any modification of them resting on the private ownership of the means of production.

Coöperation would be a seductive means of escape, as enabling the poor to become richer without making the rich poorer, and most social reformers cannot, even now, refrain from keeping alive lingering hopes that some means of performing the impossible may here be found. But a whole generation of experiment has done little more than show the futility of expecting real help from this quarter. Less than one four hundredth part of the industry of the country is yet carried on by coöperation. The whole range of industrial development seems against it, and no ground for hope in coöperation as a complete answer to the social problem can be gained from economic history. It affords a valuable moral training, a profitable but somewhat hazardous savings bank for small investments, and a temporary means of interesting the worker in the industrial affairs of his country. But it is merely a survival from the days before Joint Stock Companies existed, and ordinary joint stock investment is now rapidly elbowing it out of the field, and, measured by the capital employed, is already a hundred and sixty times as great as coöperation. Now, even the most enthusiastic believer in the virtues of association will hardly expect salvation merely from a regime of "Corporations;" and this, and not coöperation, is clearly the line in which our industrial development is rapidly travelling. It will, of course, be some time before the more enthusiastic coöperators realize it, or even become aware that modern economic science turns regretfully against them; but the rank and file are rapidly learning the lesson, and are gradually turning towards those principles of Socialism, out of which the present coöperative movement sprang.<sup>1</sup> Its more democratic leaders have never ceased to hold them and to regret the general neglect of citizenship for mere huckstering and scramble for dividends, into which so much of the noble coöperative ideal has sunk.

But even a universal extension of voluntary coöperation, productive or distributive, would not obviate the tribute of labor to ownership, which private property in land and all its modifications necessarily involves. 'Coöperation aims at abolishing, not economic rent, but industrial competition, and it has positively no vision of anything beyond ownership by coöperative groups, the workers paying a fixed instead of an uncertain interest on all their land and other "Capital." This might improve the relations between the capitalist and the laborer and even put an end to competition between traders, but it prefigures no abolition of the tribute from labor to ownership, and few English economists would now be inclined to dispute with John Stuart Mill that, "as Feugueray well says, 'the deepest root of the evils and iniquities which fill the industrial world is not competition, but the subjection of labor to capital and the enormous share which the possessors of the instruments of industry are able to take from the produce.'"<sup>2</sup>

It is essentially this "enormous share" of rent and interest, now amounting in the United Kingdom to over one-third of the produce,<sup>3</sup> to which Socialists object, and not, as is supposed by President Walker and others, to the high "rent of ability" earned by managers and other workers of scarce personal attainments. Much, of course, of the so-called "profits" of modern capitalist industry are now seen to be merely the fruits of speculation and of the unnecessary multiplication of dealers and distributors. Much of the so-called "rent of ability" is due merely to the advantages of social position and the possession of an expensive education. Genuine "rent of ability" the scarce worker will always be able to obtain under any social system, if he insists upon it, but English economists would now usually agree that the rent and interest could conceivably be gradually diverted from individuals to the public exchequer by appropriate legislative enactments, without dislocation of industry or depriving any contemporary worker of the product of his toil.

The recent development of corporations, rings and trusts merely accentuates the industrial situation and prepares the way for further public control. Competition is now admitted to fail as a regulator of private greed and to give way before ordered industrial association.<sup>1</sup> It is already clear that the democracy will not allow this "monarchizing" of industry to pass beyond its control, and consequently the further progress of Factory legislation, of municipal and national industrial administration, and the increasing absorption of rent and interest by taxation now receives the hesitating support,<sup>2</sup> instead of encountering the determined resistance, of the economic Professors and their students. The well-worn platitudes about the universal paramountcy of "self-help," and the almost divine honors paid to "the law of supply and demand," appear now only in the leading articles of Conservative newspapers or the speeches of politicians or Bishops—that is to say, in nearly all the directions which assume to guide our public action. The English economist himself knows them no more, and (if he is of democratic sympathies) finds himself, to his surprise, differing from the reasonable socialist agitator only in matters of detail and terminology or as to the desirable rate of progress and the relative emphasis on various points. The usual distinction is one of individual temperament, accompanied by a very general ignorance of each other's real position. Neither in economic theory nor in political application is there any longer a real divergence of principle between them.

7.—PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL SOCIALISM.

It is difficult to assign a beginning to English socialist legislation, even in the modern sense of the term. Before the Mediaeval conception of the State has passed away, the Elizabethan Poor Laws, culminating in the great Act of 1601, definitely asserted the right of the very poorest to participate in the results of the national industry. During the next two centuries socialistic legislation was almost confined to this form of collectivist philanthropy, while the commercial development of the country was preparing the way for the great industrial revolution and the triumph of private capitalism. At the beginning of the present century the zenith of industrial individualism seems to have been reached. Political tyranny was at its height but the fullest liberty was left to the owner of land and capital, so far, at least, as all the new industries were concerned, to use them for his utmost personal advantage, however many lives of men, women and children were destroyed in the process. The results upon the national life were so appalling that practical statesmen were compelled to intervene. The first Factory Act was passed in 1802,<sup>1</sup> and others followed in 1819 (59 Geo. III c. 66), 1825 (6 Geo. IV c. 63) and 1831 (1 and 2 Wm. IV c. 39). It was however left for the gradually developing humanitarian influence, led by Tory and aristocratic members, such as Mr. M. T. Sadler and Lord Shaftesbury, to make these limitations upon private property really effective, in the teeth of the most embittered opposition from the contemporary Liberals and political economists.

Since that day the progress has been rapid. Every decade has seen a notable stride taken towards genuine popular government, and every such advance has been used by the people to procure the passage of further socialist legislation.

The Reform Bill of 1832, mere middle-class enfranchisement as it was, resulted in 1833 (3 and 4 Wm. IV c. 103) in the first really effective factory act, and enabled Lord Ashley (afterwards Lord Shaftesbury) to carry his acts of 1842, 1844 and 1847, each imposing fresh restrictions on private ownership of the means of production. The same reforming impulse gave us the Mining Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vic. c. 99) and by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835 created several hundred energetic centres of local socialistic development. The same period saw the beginning of sanitary legislation, by which a further series of limitations were imposed on land and capital owners for the common weal. During the first 45 years of the century nearly 400 "Local Improvement Acts" were passed, conferring sanitary powers upon more than 200 local authorities<sup>1</sup>.

In 1847 and 1848, these scattered legislative powers were gathered up into important codes, finally consolidated in the "Public Health Act" of 1875. This legislation is wholly socialist in character. Innumerable restrictions upon the free use of private property are imposed, and the rights of ownership are thereby in the public interest considerably curtailed. The value of the inferior kinds of house property is frequently much diminished by the enforcement of these provisions. The community, by its local political organizations, has assumed the collective administration of innumerable social services and levies, mainly to the advantage of the poorer classes, a series of "rates," or assessments upon real property, which now absorb a large percentage of its annual rental. This class of socialist legislation is constantly increasing.

It is not only in matters of sanitation that this "municipal socialism" is progressing. Nearly half the gas consumers of the Kingdom already consume gas made by themselves as citizens collectively, in 168 different localities<sup>2</sup>, as many as 14 local authorities obtained power to borrow money to engage in the gas industry in a single year<sup>3</sup>. Water supply is rapidly coming to be universally a matter of public provision, no fewer than 71 separate governing bodies obtaining loans for this purpose in the year 1885-6 alone<sup>1</sup>. The prevailing tendency is for the municipalities to absorb also the tramway (horse-cars) industry, 31 localities already owning their own lines, comprising a quarter of the total mileage in the Kingdom<sup>2</sup>. Eight of these authorities lease their lines, but the others do not shrink from this public organization of labor and successfully administer their own property. Several of them even hire lines from neighboring owners and work them on lease. The franchises of the London Tramway Companies expire in a few years, and there is already a strong feeling in favor of the lines being worked directly by the County Council as the only practicable means of securing shorter hours and proper treatment for the employés.

Besides the numerous acts regulating factories and workshops, and similar legislation dealing with mines, printworks, fishcuring establishments, bakehouses, alkali works and many other industries, there are now extensive codes regulating merchant shipping and seamen, gasworks, railways, tramways, theatres, public houses, and in fact nearly every large trade.

Nor is there any sign of a slackening in this progress. The "Shop Hours Regulation Act" of 1887 limited the hours during which any shop employing "young persons" may be kept open; and it is already apparent that a formidable agitation will soon compel the explicit restriction of the working day for adults. The Political Economists will offer no opposition as to principle. "I see nothing," said Professor Jevons already in 1882, referring to the proposal for an "Eight Hours Bill," "to forbid the State interfering in the matter if it could be clearly shown that the existing customs are injurious to health, and that there is no other probable remedy. Neither principle, experience nor precedent, in other cases of legislation, prevents us from contemplating the idea of State interference in such circumstances."<sup>1</sup>

Public education will not appear a socialist measure in the United States, where the ample resources of the reserved public lands prevent its essentially collectivist character from being recognized. In England, however, the rapid progress towards free government schools is rightly cited as a marked instance of socialist progress. The increasing absorption of the incomes of the comparatively rich, to provide for the education of their poorer brethren, makes its socialist character disagreeably obtrusive to the capitalist as well as to the private school proprietor. The movement towards the public provision of meals in the schools of poor districts is a still stronger testimony to the growth of the "collective" spirit. Many hundreds of thousands of gratuitous or cheap meals are already supplied to city children by organized charitable efforts with the coöperation of the school authorities. The London School Board has already begun to discuss the necessity of placing these private collective agencies under direct public control and supervision. "One free meal a day," to be provided by the School Board itself, out of the rates upon property, was in the programme of not a few School Board candidates last year; and Mrs. Besant, the leading socialist advocate of this measure, was triumphantly returned at the head of the poll in East London.

The necessity of providing public work for the "unemployed," now a chronic winter feature of our great cities, is becoming daily more generally recognized. The government has already been forced to issue circulars to all local authorities urging them to set on foot extra works for the sake of offering employment at low wages to those demanding it. This is now done each winter, to a small extent, in many localities, and there is now a demand for the permanent public organization of the labor of all the recipients of Poor Law relief. Plans suggested by the Rev. Herbert Mills and others, based on the Industrial Colonies of Holland and Germany, are about to be tried, as it is now universally admitted that only by such collectivist measures can the evils be dealt with.

The "Housing of the Poor" in England's great cities is another problem already beginning to be solved on essentially socialist lines. Over six million dollars have already been spent by London local authorities in subsidizing the building of cheap artisans' dwellings, and it is now strongly urged that the London County Council should take up the work with greatly increased energy. The city of Glasgow has, indeed, gone much further, the municipality (which already provides gas, water, markets, baths, washhouses, slaughterhouses, parks, botanic gardens, art galleries, museums, libraries, tramways, "houses of refuge," and industrial and other schools) having demolished vast areas of "slum" property, and itself built large blocks of dwellings for the poor, let at "moderate" rents. The municipality also maintains a number of "common lodging houses" with most successful results.<sup>1</sup>

This "Municipal Socialism" is being rapidly imitated by other local authorities with the effect of absorbing in "rates" a constantly increasing share of the rental of the country. Our progressive "municipalization of rent," by increase of local rates, is clearly only an unconscious form of gradual Land Nationalization. Many students, however, still have the idea that Socialism implies a rigidly centralized national administration of all the details of life. This is an entire misapprehension of the Socialist position. Such a society would be as abhorrent to Mr. William Morris as to Mr. Auberon Herbert. Socialists have, in fact, as yet contributed nothing to the difficult problem of political science as to the proper line of division between the functions of the central government and those of local authorities. All that can be said is, that in England Socialists and Individualists alike will more probably desire to make the regulation and taxation of private industry matters of centralization, whilst actual public administration will probably be municipal. Factory Acts<sup>2</sup> and the Land tax will be national, but gasworks and tramways local.

Subject to this distinction, hardly anyone now objects to the extension of local government activity. The innumerable multiplicity of services now performed by the local governing authorities makes it indeed impossible to record them all and causes the English Government, in its various ramifications, to be by far the largest direct employer of labor in the country.

Besides our international relations and the army, navy, police and the courts of justice, the community now carries on for itself, in some part or another of these islands, the post-office; telegraphs, carriage of small commodities, coinage surveys, the regulation of the currency and note issue, the provision of weights and measures, the making, sweeping, lighting and repairing of the streets, roads and bridges, life insurance, the grant of annuities, ship-building, stock broking, banking, farming and money lending. It provides for many thousands of us from birth to burial, midwifery, nursery, education, board and lodging, vaccination, medical attendance, medicine, public worship, amusements and burial. It furnishes and maintains its own museums, parks, botanic gardens, art galleries, libraries, concert halls, roads, streets, bridges, markets, fire engines, light-houses, pilots, ferries, surf boats, steamtugs, lifeboats, slaughter-houses, cemeteries, public baths, wash houses, pounds, harbors, piers, wharves, hospitals, dispensaries, gas works, water works, tramways, telegraph cables, allotments, cow meadows, artisans' dwellings, common lodging houses, schools, churches, and reading rooms. It carries on and publishes its own researches in geology, meteorology, statistics, zoölogy, geography, and even theology. In our colonies the English Government further allows and encourages the communities to provide for themselves railways, canals, pawnbroking, theatres, forestry, cinchona farms, irrigation, leper villages, casinos, bathing establishments, and immigration; and to deal in ballast, guano, quinine, opium, salt, and what not.<sup>1</sup> Every one of these functions, including even the army, navy, police and courts of justice, was at one time left to private enterprise, and was a source of legitimate individual investment of capital. Step by step the community has absorbed them, wholly or partially, and the area of private exploitation has been lessened. Parallel with this progressive nationalization or municipalization of industry, there has gone on, outside, the elimination of the purely personal element in business management. The older economists doubted whether anything but banking and insurance could be carried on by joint stock enterprise; now every conceivable industry down to baking and milk-selling is successfully managed by the salaried officers of large corporations of idle shareholders. More than one-third of the whole business of England, measured by the capital employed, is now done by joint stock companies,<sup>2</sup> whose shareholders could be expropriated by the community with little more dislocation of industry than is caused by the daily purchase of shares on the Stock Exchange.

Besides all its direct supersession of private enterprise, the State now registers, inspects and controls nearly all the industrial functions which it has not yet absorbed. In addition to births, marriages, death, and electors, the State registers all solicitors, barristers, notaries, brokers, newspaper proprietors, playing-card makers, brewers, bankers, seamen, captains, mates, doctors, cabmen, hawkers, pawn brokers, tobacconists, distillers, plate dealers, game dealers, all insurance companies, friendly societies, endowed schools and charities, limited companies, lands, houses, deeds, bills of sale, compositions, ships, arms, dogs, cats, omnibuses, books, plays, pamphlets, newspapers, raw cotton, trade marks, and patents; lodging houses, public houses, refreshment houses, theatres, music halls, places of worship, elementary schools, and dancing rooms.

Nor is the registration a mere form. Most of the foregoing are also inspected and criticized, as well as all railways, tramways, ships, mines, factories, canal boats, public conveyances, fisheries, slaughter houses, dairies, milk shops, bakeries, baby farms, gas meters, schools of anatomy, vivisection laboratories, explosive works, Scotch herrings and common lodging houses.

The inspection is often detailed and exhaustive. It may be said moreover, once for all, the laws of this kind are much more rigidly enforced and generally obeyed in England than in the United States. The State in most of the larger industrial operations prescribes the age of the worker, the hours of work, the amount of air, light, cubic space, heat, lavatory accommodation, holidays, and meal times; where, when, and how wages shall be paid; how machinery, staircases, lift-holes, mines, and quarries are to be fenced and guarded; how and when the plant shall be cleaned, repaired, and worked. Even the kind of package in which some articles shall be sold is duly prescribed, so that the individual capitalist shall take no advantage of his position. On every side he is being registered, inspected, controlled, and eventually superseded by the community, and is compelled in the meantime to cede for public purposes an ever increasing share of his rent and interest.

It will be objected by many persons that this is not what they understand by Socialism. There are doubtless still some who might be compelled to admit that they imagined that Socialists wanted to bring about a sanguinary conflict in the streets, and then the next day to compel all delicately nurtured people to work at a fixed rate of wages, in the government factories. This, however, is merely part of the obstinate survival of the "Utopian" conception of Socialism already referred to. Whether we so describe them or not, these features of modern English society are essentially "collectivist" in character, and are utterly contrary to the Individualist principles lately dominant in thought. Mr. Herbert Spencer quite properly regards the whole course of legislation during the present generation as subversive of that unrestrained individual liberty which forms his ideal of social order.<sup>1</sup> He also foretells its inevitable issue.

"The numerous socialistic changes made by Act of Parliament joined with numerous others presently to be made, will by and by be all merged in State Socialism—swallowed in the vast wave which they have little by little raised." "It is indeed certain," the political economists now agree, "that industrial society will not permanently remain without a systematic organization. The mere conflict of private interests will never produce a well-ordered commonwealth of labor."<sup>2</sup>

Our unconscious acceptance of this progressive Socialism is a striking testimony to the change which has come over the country of Godwin, Malthus and James Mill. The "practical man," oblivious or contemptuous of any theory of the Social Organism or general principles of social organization, has been forced by the necessities of the time, into an ever deepening collectivist channel. Socialism, of course, he still rejects and despises. The Individualist City Councillor will walk along the municipal pavement, lit by municipal gas and cleansed by municipal brooms with municipal water, and seeing by the municipal clock in the municipal market, that he is too early to meet his children coming from the municipal school hard by the county lunatic asylum and municipal hospital, will use the national telegraph system to tell them not to walk through the municipal park but to come by the municipal tramway, to meet him in the municipal reading room, by the municipal art gallery, museum and library, where he intends to consult some of the national publications in order to prepare his next speech in the municipal town-hall, in favor of the nationalization of canals and the increase of the government control over the railway system. "Socialism, sir," he will say, "don't waste the time of a practical man by your fantastic absurdities. Self-help, sir, individual self-help, that's what's made our city what it is."

8.—SOCIALISM IN POLITICS.

The difference between English and American politics is hardly to be understood save by lengthy personal experience, but it may be suggested that English statesmen are much more disposed than American to carry into actual legislative effect the proposals pressed upon them from below. Political platforms tend to be constructed, not so much out of abstract statements of rights and principles, as out of lists of new laws to be passed by the successful party. The English Constitution is admittedly deemed in need of perpetual legislative tinkering, and every Englishman, not excluding the most conservative, has his own pet list of necessary reforms. In the United States the popular cry seems to be mainly for good administration; in England it is undoubtedly for new laws. "Measures, not men," is still the English voter's motto.

This striking difference, in itself not without significance, leads to important consequences when public feeling is pressing in any political direction. The gradual "socialising" of politics, out of which the parliamentary and municipal socialism has sprung, is rendered possible by the fluidity of the English Constitution. "It may be fearlessly said that no social transformation would be too great to be commended and attempted if only it could be clearly shown to lead to the greater happiness of the community. No scheme of Bellers, or Baboeuf, or Robert Owen could be resisted, if only their advocates could adduce scientific evidence of their practicability and good tendency. No laws, no customs, no rights of property are so sacred that they may not be made away with, if it can be clearly shown that they stand in the way of the greatest happiness. Salus populi suprema lex."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup>Jevons' The State in Relation to Labor (1882), ch. I., p. 12. It is interesting to compare with this deliberate statement of the English Economist the opinion of Professor W. G. Sumner (Yale), "It is not to be admitted for a moment that liberty is a means to social Statesmen have, as we have seen, not been backward in availing themselves of this philosophic permission to improve the condition of society by national or municipal action. Nor do they meet with resistance from their trained staff of permanent officials. The English Civil Service is generally "collectivist" in its influence, even where not democratic, but nearly every government office now contains a number of advanced Socialists. The present condition of English politics makes it apparent that the progress in the future will be even greater than in the past. The near approach to genuine "manhood suffrage" has already compelled both great parties to profess their intention of passing further remedial legislation, and, whilst they still weakly repudiate Socialism, almost every proposal bears the socialist stamp<sup>1</sup>.

The Conservative party, now in power through the alliance of the "Liberal Unionists," can admittedly only retain office on condition of passing measures acceptable to the urban democracy. The old rural Tory element, with tendencies toward a protective tariff, and a feudal extension of the Poor Law, is becoming more and more subordinated to the so-called "Tory Democracy," whose members appeal to the city artisans by promising socialistic legislation against their employers. The almost revolutionary extension of local self-government conceded by the Conservative Government in 1888, will undoubtedly ends, and that it may be impaired for major considerations. . . . It is not at all the function of the State to make men happy." (What Social Classes owe to Each other pp. 34-5.)

be used for a further extension of "Municipal Socialism." The urban Conservatives feel compelled to promise additional remedies for the poverty of our great cities, and talk of state-assisted emigration, the exclusion of foreign labor and the possibility of compulsory state insurance of all wage-earners. All these, be it noted, however ill-considered, are essentially "collectivist" proposals, opposed to every principle of Individualism. Meanwhile the leaders in Parliament are forced to act.

The "Allotments Act" of 1886 enabled local authorities to acquire land compulsorily in order to let it to small cultivators, and marks the beginning of "land municipalization." Extensions of the Factory Acts, Truck Acts, Sanitary Acts, and especially Artisans' Dwellings Acts, are only other instances of the Conservative tendency towards Socialism, prematurely predicted by their great leader fifty years ago.<sup>1</sup>

But the Conservative Party, essentially the party of wealth and privilege, is naturally less advanced than its rival. The Liberal Party has now definitely discarded the Individualist Laissez Faire, upon which, as a middle class organization, it was so largely founded, and, with every approach towards democracy, becomes more markedly socialist in character. Ireland has already led so "Conservative" a statesman as Mr. Gladstone to deal successive blows at "landlordism," from the effect of which all private property in land and rent now totters. The Liberal Party is fully committed to free schools, special taxation of urban land values and large schemes of "Housing the Poor."

The London Liberal and Radical Union, the official party organization in the metropolis, with the Right Honorable John Morley, M. P., for president, has lately expressly promoted a measure to enable the London County Council to build unlimited artisans' dwellings, to be let at moderate rents, and to be paid for by a special tax, unrestricted in amount, to be levied on London landlords only.<sup>1</sup> No more extreme "socialistic" proposal could possibly be made, short of complete communism itself.

This, however, is merely the proposal of the "official Liberal" party. The Radical wing, every day increasing in relative influence, demands measures much more general in their socialistic tendency.

One of the most significant changes is the attitude of the London workingmen's clubs. These two hundred or more spontaneous democratic organizations of the metropolitan artisans constitute the most important part of the fighting strength of London Liberalism, and directly control at least one-fifth of its votes. Ten years ago their prevailing tone was a somewhat harsh, secular Radicalism, seeking extreme reforms in political machinery, but leaving social problems entirely to individual effort and an exaggerated faith in trades unionism. Now these organizations are pulling the party in quite the other direction. Merely political reforms are becoming daily more subordinated to attempts to deal with social problems. The prevailing note of the clubs is now a progressive collectivism. The nationalization of the land hardly meets with dissent, and free schools (secondary as well as primary), the special taxation of urban land values, a steeply graduated income tax, and the widest possible extension of municipal administration are unanimously demanded. London Radicalism is rapidly merging its harsh atheistic Individualism in a broad humanitarian Collectivism. Socialist lecturers are in incessant demand, and the Liberal party managers have avowedly come to the conclusion that London needs a specially socialist platform. The "Star," the chief organ in the press of this Socialist Radicalism, constantly presses for a complete programme of social reconstruction, and the "abolition of undeserved poverty." The late School Board and County Council elections in London, as well as the recent Parliamentary "bye elections," were "run" on this policy, with a success which makes it certain that the next Parliamentary election, though obscured by the Home Rule issue, will follow on much the same lines. The following "programme for London," extracted from the "Star," 8th of August, 1888, will serve not only as a graphic example of what English Radicalism has now come to mean, but also, significantly enough, as a concrete statement of all the proximate demands of the English Socialist Party.

REVISION OF TAXATION.

Object.—Complete shifting of burden from the workers, of whatever grade, to the recipients of rent and interest, with a view to the ultimate and gradual extinction of the latter class.

Means.—Abolition of all customs and excise duties, except those on spirits. 2. Increase of income tax, differentiating in favor of earned as against unearned incomes, and graduating cumulatively by system of successive levels of abatement. 3. Equalization and increase of death duties and the use of the proceeds as capital, not income. 4. Shifting of local rates and house duty from occupier to owner, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. 5. Compulsory redemption of existing land tax, and reimposition on all ground rents and increased values. 6. Abolition of fees on licenses for employment. 7. Abolition of police court fees.

EXTENSION OF FACTORY ACTS.

Object.—To raise, universally, the standard of comfort by obtaining the general recognition of a minimum wage and a maximum working day.

Means.—1. Extension of the general provisions of the Factory and Workshops Acts (or the Mines Regulation Acts, as the case may be) to all employers of labor. 2. Compulsory registration of all employers of more than three(?) workers. 3. Largely increased number of Inspectors, and these to include women, and to be mainly chosen from the wage-earning class. 4. Immediate reduction of maximum hours to eight per day in all government and municipal employment, in all mines, and in all licensed monopolies, such as railways, tramways, gas-works, waterworks, docks, harbors, etc., and in any trade in which a majority of the workers desire it. 5. The compulsory insertion of clauses in all contracts for government or municipal supplies, providing that (a) there shall be no sub-contracting; (b) that no worker shall be employed more than eight hours per day, and (c) that no wages less than a prescribed minimum shall be paid.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

Object.—To enable all, even the poorest, children to obtain not merely some, but the best education they are capable of.

Means.—1. The immediate abolition of all fees in public elementary schools, board or voluntary, with a corresponding increase in the government grant. 2. Creation of a Minister for Education, with control over the whole educational system, from the elementary school to the University, and over all educational endowments. 3. Provision of public technical and secondary schools wherever needed, and creation of abundant public secondary scholarships. 4. Continuation, in all cases, of elementary education at evening schools. 5. Registration and inspection of all private educational establishments.

REORGANIZATION OF POOR LAW ADMINISTRATION.

Object.—To provide generously and without stigma for the aged, the sick, and those destitute through temporary want of employment, without relaxing the "tests" against the endowment of able-bodied idleness.

Means.—1. The separation of the relief of the aged and the sick, from the workhouse system, by a universal system of aged pensions and public infirmaries. 2. The industrial organization and technical education of all able-bodied paupers. 3. The provision of temporary relief works for the unemployed. 4. The supersession of the Boards of Guardians by the local municipal authorities.

EXTENSION OF MUNICIPAL ACTIVITY.

Object.—The gradual public organization of labor for all public purposes, and the elimination of the private capitalist and middleman.

Means.—1. The provision of increased facilities for the acquisition of land, the destruction without compensation of all dwellings found unfit for habitation, and the provision of artisans, dwellings by the municipality. 2. The facilitation of every extension of municipal administration, in London and all other towns, of gas, water, markets, tramways, hospitals, cemeteries, parks, museums, art galleries, libraries, reading-rooms, schools, docks, harbors, rivers, etc. 3. The provision of abundant facilities for the acquisition of land by local rural authorities, for allotments, common pastures, public halls, reading rooms, etc.

AMENDMENT OF POLITICAL MACHINERY.

Object.—To obtain the most accurate representation and expression of the desires of the majority of the people at every moment.

Means.—1. Reform of registration so as to give a vote, both parliamentary and municipal, to every adult. 2. Abolition of any period of residence as a qualification for registration. 3. Bi-annual registration by special public officer. 4. Payment of election expenses, including postage of election addresses and polling cards. 5. Payment of all public representatives, parliamentary, county or municipal. 6. Second ballot. 7. Abolition or painless extinction of House of Lords.

This is the kind of programme to which a generation of trades unionism and political enfranchisement has brought the English artisan since the crude political reforms advocated by the Chartists. Like John Stuart Mill, though less explicitly, he has abandoned mere political democracy for an almost complete socialism.

It need hardly be said that no such programme of legislation can be carried out in a single session. It is probable, indeed, that for much of it the rest of England is not yet sufficiently prepared. The tendency is, however, strong in that direction, and the "political momentum which, instead of diminishing or remaining constant, increases,"<sup>1</sup> will inevitably carry us rapidly forward. The individual appropriation of rent and interest is becoming more and more discredited among the mass of the population who are practically unable to share in this income; and they are quickly coming to demand that social arrangements shall be deliberately based on what are essentially socialist principles. The Christian is every day inclining to the feeling that his faith requires him to support the same demand; the Political Economist has ceased to resist, counselling merely circumspection and moderation; the practical reformer is driven by the impossibility of otherwise adequately dealing with social evils into the same direction, and the statesman sees more and more clearly that this is the outcome of urban Democracy in advanced industrial communities, with their excessive development of city life. The industrial evolution, as usual, precedes and accompanies the political, and all social tendencies point to the same end. What the exact form and machinery may be, it is, of course, impossible to predict, but no student of English thought and politics can doubt that England is destined to become constantly more and more "collectivist" as it advances in industrial complexity, in realized wealth, and in political democracy. The Individualism of the past is buried, and the immediate future is unmistakably with a progressive Socialism, the full extent of which no man can yet see.

THE MAGAZINE OF AMERICAN HISTORY

THE NINETEENTH VOLUME COMMENCES WITH JANUARY, 1898.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $5 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

The high character and growing importance of this standard and popular periodical are becoming more generally known and cordially appreciated with every issue. It is a marvel of excellence. The ablest and the most charming historical writers are constantly contributing to its pages the fresh results of careful research and profound study. This magazine is doing more to cultivate a national taste for historical literature, and the desire for authentic knowledge concerning the affairs of the past which affect the present and future of our country, and ourselves, than any other monthly publication in the world.

It is edited with such skill that it never fails to interest readers of all ages and creeds, and it educates the young. It includes in its scope topics locally interesting in all parts of the country; and it is without a rival in its special field.

Its illustrations are of the choicest character and always of historic significance. Many rare and valuable portraits are here engraved for the first time.
